The radiation shielding properties of some stainless steels have been investigated. For this purpose, linear attenuation coefficients have been measured at photon energy levels of 662 and 1250 keV. The obtained results showed that ferritic stainless steels were more capable in stopping the high energy photons than their nonmagnetic counterparts.