In this study, ETIAL 160 aluminum materials were obtained with injection method under 300 Mpa injection pressure for 30 h cooling periods. Rolling and casting processes were applied to these materials and structural and mechanical properties of the materials were compared. When the microstructures of the obtained materials were examined, we concluded that the porosities decrease in the materials produced by casting, while the hardness values are higher than that of rolled materials.